We will do our best to reverse this dangerous verdict on appeal. Artists should be free to make art depicting the world around them, to title that art in a way that describes what it is, and to sell it for money. 1/

Opinion | A misguided jury failed to see the art in Mason Rothschild's MetaBirkins. In playing off trademarked goods, the MetaBirkins artist was just doing what artists have always done.

Art critic and art historian @BlakeGopnik captures my feelings perfectly here: "...imagined that no jury would actually prevent a young artist from making pictures of pretty much whatever he wanted, whether it bothered a great bag-maker or not..." 2/

"I thought the more the art bothered that bag-maker, the clearer it would be that Rothschild was on to something potent, and that the jury would see that right off." 3/

I believe the problem is with the public opinion surrounding crypto in general, the fall of FTX, 3AC, various publicized NFT scams, etc are what create a shady image for anything associated with cryptocurrency
